More students learn English than any other language. From modern, high-tech classrooms to rural schools in the developing world, English is spreading. It's not, however, always an easy job to pick up this modern lingua franca. There are some guidelines for smoothing the learning procedure out.

If you ask teachers, many will say that shyness stops a whole lot of students. Adults, in particular, tend to fear to make mistakes and to look foolish in a language they do not master yet. Just getting over this hump will help students improve their speaking greatly.

The least intimidating way to get in a lot of speaking time is to practice with others who are learning English. Finding someone with a different mother tongue is very useful, since making it impossible to revert to your native tongue when things get hard. At the same time, as you are both beginners, it might not seem as daunting as facing a native speaker of English.

Eventually, though, interacting with native speakers is essential to master English. A whole lot of students find that they concentrate on the mistakes they may make or that they won't understand. However, this is a vital part of learning how to talk about things you don't know, which is going to be a lifelong tool. Also, you should remember that most English speakers will find it incredible that you are learning English. They might lament their lack of language skills.

Lots of learners that are new also find prepositions in English confusing and even unnecessary. However, as random as they may seem, they do follow the rules and add significance to different phrases. Beginners need to internalize them as best as possible. But then, they should stick to the cue of speakers. This is the quickest way to learn to speak fluently and relatively effortlessly.

English also has some unique consonants that speakers of different languages often find difficult. A particularly difficult one is the "th" sound. The major language with a noise that is similar is Arabic. Speakers of other languages often feel odd with a protruding tongue scraping along their teeth to create a legitimate sound. Practice in private will help. Learners can mimic the models in textbooks and assess their tongue position in the mirror. It should be noted that there are two variations of the "th" sound; one is tender, and one is tough.

Beyond certain sounds, the sheer variety of accents can seem impossible to overcome. However, students do not need to feel like they have to decide on a single accent and stick with it forever. They are also able to choose one to start with and practice listening to others online as time permits. Most learners find that they can change their accent comparatively easily.
